Salvage divers worked to incredible depths (which often exceeded 300ft) and did so using only compressed air, a feat frowned upon by recreational and salvage divers in today's work-safe environment. Furthermore all demolition work was carried out using highly volatile nitroglycerine based explosives which have not been available in Australia since the early 1980's

This book gives a personal account of the constant danger, ongoing problems, delays, and equipment failure during expeditions which frequently included encounters with sharks, in the water and on land! It chronicles the determination and fierce rivalry between salvagers, the risks and gains, the close calls with death in precarious and often very remote locations. It tells of courage and stupidity, of risk and reward.

No book has ever been written about these remarkable years where the riches of successful salvage were up for grabs by the most determined salvager and his team. The book also offers divers and shipwreck researchers a comprehensive shipwreck reference of all known and disabled wrecks in New Guinea. Even if you have never seen the dark shadow of a shipwreck beneath the sea, this book will astound you.
