Everyone knows Leona would do anything for her daughter, Beth: she moved to Church Langdon to send Beth to the best school, built a business to support them and found the perfect little cottage to call home. They hike together, shop together, share their hopes and fears. It's the relationship every mother dreams of.

But Leona never talks about why they moved to the Lake District.

She's never told Beth anything about her father.

She says Beth should never speak to strangers. She says Beth doesn't need friends.

She's only trying to protect her daughter.

But sometimes the person closest to you is the person you shouldn't trust.
